Resident Labour Force in Sector	4
---------------------------------	---

Executive Summary

By 2021, Ranchland No. 66's resident labour force in this sector had vanished. Available data indicate a small resident presence in 2016, followed by a full contraction over the next five years, so that no resident workers aged 15 and over were recorded in the sector by the end of the period.

The defining pattern is not volatility but complete loss. In 2016, the sector included 10 resident workers. By 2021, that figure had dropped to 0, representing a 100.0% decline across the period. The shift is especially clear because the time series is brief and unambiguous: the sector moved from a modest base to no recorded resident labour force at all. Nothing in the source points to partial retention, gradual decline, or any recovery during those years.

Ranchland No. 66 therefore shows a simple but stark outcome: a limited resident labour force presence in 2016 had entirely disappeared by 2021.

Resident Labour Force in Sector

Ranchland No. 66 recorded no resident labour force in this sector in 2021, down from 10 people in 2016. The five-year change was -100.0%, leaving the sector at zero.

Ranchland No. 66 shows a complete contraction in resident labour force in this sector by 2021. Within the labour force aged 15 years and over, the sector count fell to 0 people, leaving no resident workers recorded in the reference year. The change is stark in the small time series available. In 2016, the sector counted 10 people. By 2021, that figure was 0, which corresponds to a 100.0% decline over five years. With no comparator values provided, the clearest story is the internal shift over time. The data do not show a gradual easing or partial recovery; they move from a small presence to none at all. For this aspect, Ranchland No. 66 is best described as having no resident labour force in the sector in 2021, after a modest base in 2016. The dataset supports a simple reading of disappearance rather than stability or growth.
